For months, executives at the big three broadcast networks have been keeping a close watch on what's airing on the Internet. Every night, they tune into online video services such as Netflix, Hulu and Amazon to see what's on the tube and where their shows rank. Sometimes they're even on Google and YouTube themselves. It's a tricky balancing act. On one hand, they want to make sure their TV shows can find a real audience, not an audience created by a handful of tiny shows that proliferate on the Web. On the other hand, they also want to protect their golden goose, the television shows and series they produce and keep selling to advertisers. (Yes, even shows on Netflix.) That's where "upfronts" come in. During TV's annual acquisition and negotiation period, the three major broadcast networks—ABC, CBS and NBC—strike deals with the cable networks to see what the market will bear for certain shows and to pick up the shows they want to move forward. The broadcast networks' strategy is to try to replicate the cable networks' relationships with major talent and to sell their shows in a robust way that will allow the networks to make money on them over time. Networks are also seeking to lock in their entertainment properties, which can be a tricky sell on the open market. What the networks won't do is pay huge upfront fees for show rights. What they can do, however, is offer upfront money to find a "home" for shows that they can then sell to cable later. If a show doesn't sell out to a cable network, the networks have another option, which is for them to sell the show to a digital distributor such as Netflix or Hulu. These distributors pay a fee for the rights to a particular show and then sell it online. Which TV shows find a home in this strategy remains a bit of a mystery. In the past, ABC, CBS and NBC have brought in higher ratings for the shows they bid on at the upfront, like "The Voice," "Modern
